This week, legislation that would prevent children from entering certain restaurants, bakeries and other food establishments died in Congress. "It's been three years since I've been a mom," says Diana Ponce, who has three young children and suffers from both food allergies and diabetes. She's concerned about how other parents in her town of Caguas, Puerto Rico, will be able to feed their children. "It's going to be really difficult." Ponce's family will have to drive miles to find a restaurant that's safe for them. Caguas, home to about half a million people, has only one full-service restaurant: Snack Factory. That's one of the main reasons why Ponce's children aren't allowed to walk to the store. Her family only goes there once a month. During that time, her son, Diego, 15, spends most of his day playing video games. Diego's sister and Ponce's daughter, Noelia, 13, are mostly left to their own devices while Diana goes grocery shopping. Some people may find this to be "a great family vacation," Ponce says. But it's not. "We can't take family vacations," she says. "We can't go to the beach. We can't go out f3916c5595
